Functions in C

A function is a block of code that performs a specific task and can be reused many times. A function declaration tells the compiler about the function name, return type, and parameters.

A function definition contains the actual code of the function. A function call is used to execute the function.

Functions improve modularity, reduce code duplication, and make programs easier to understand and maintain.